

Foods Unique to Various Eating Traditions included in the NCC Food and Nutrient Database

Last updated on January 03, 2023

Many foods unique to the eating traditions of various cultural groups in the U.S. are included in the NDSR Database. To take into account the varying ways some dishes may be prepared, variable ingredient and preparation method questions are included in NDSR so that the dish as prepared and eaten is reflected. As an example, when entering ‘pot stickers’ in NDSR prompts include the method of preparation (‘fried’ or ‘steamed or boiled’) and whether the pot stickers are ‘with meat’ or ‘without meat’.

This document provides listings of some of the foods included in the NDSR database for various eating traditions. See the index below to locate listings of interest to you. Please note that the lists are not all-encompassing. Lists are not provided for some cuisines (e.g., Italian, Greek, German, etc.), and not all foods are listed for cuisines for which there are lists. For example, foods that have become common in the United States but originate from another eating tradition are included in NDSR but not highlighted on this list. Also, in some cases, foods could appear on more than one list because the food is not unique to just one eating tradition. For example, ‘samosa (sambusa, sambosa, sambuza, or singara)’ is listed under the “Foods consumed across multiple eating traditions” category. These listings were created from the NDSR 2022 database. If you are using a subsequent version of NDSR there may be more foods than are included in these lists because we are continually expanding foods in the database to better reflect varying eating traditions.
